they Allege That She Is Under the Control of Hear's Richardson Rogers, 'in Notorious Fraud," Who is Swindling Her by Spiritualstic Practices - Letters to Prove Her Insane. Frederick C. Beach, son of the late Alfred C. Beach, editor of the Scientific American, and his sister, Mrs. Jenny Beach Gaspar, through Elihu Hoot, their counsel, applied yesterday to Justice

sekman of the Supreme Court for the appointment of a committee to take charge of the person their mother, Mrs. Harriet E. Beach, pending an examination as to her sanity, alleging that she is mentally unsound and incapable of controlling her affairs, and is in great danger of healog all her property through the plotting of Henry Richardson Rogers, a spiritualist medium, who claims to be her husband by virtue of an alleged marriage ceremony performed at the Preshyerian Mission at Alexandria, Egypt, on Jan. 26 list. Mrs. Beach is at present living in Venice with Rogers, and Justice Beekman ordered the service of the notice of the petition by mail, and also enjoined Mrs. Beach from disposing of any of her property pending an investigation by the

He fixed June 1 as the return day. This pedition recalls the incarceration of Mrs. Beach in 1891 at the instance of her husband to get her from the clutches of Ann O'Delia Salomon-the notorious Mme, Diss De Bar-and s nedium named Souter, both of whom had fire ured in the spirit-painting tricks that duped the ate Luther R. Marsh, the lawyer, and in which they had also got Mrs. Beach interested. The decision of Frederick C. Beach and his sister, Mrs. Gaspar, to take legal action to remove their mother from the influence and con trol of Rogers was arrived at a month ago, and was based upon letters received from Mrs. Beach. They placed the matter in the hands of Boorsem, Hamilton, Beckett & Ransom. The Meavit of Frederick Beach in support of the application sets forth that his mother is now 67 years old, and that he and his sister were an winted administrators of the estate of their ather, who died intestate in this city on Jan. 1, 1896. Mr. Beach deposes that his mother is ntitled to a third interest in the real and peronal estate of Alfred C. Beach, and also a dower right. The personal estate at the time of the teath of Mr. Beach amounted to $27,000. The real estate was estimated to be worth $195,000. Mr. Beach avers that his mother has been twice confined in insane asylums, the first time in 1855 at Hartford. In 1867 she had to be cenfined to a room in the Beach homestead at Stratford for several months on account of extreme violence. He asserts that for many years she has been a monomaniae on the subject of piritualism, and recites the facts of her removal to Bloomingdale in 1891.

Some time after her release, so the affidavit avers, she met Rogers, whom Frederich Beach asserts is " a notorious fraud, who posed as a medium and in other capacities at so-called These meetings were freevent, and Rogers's influence greatly exacgerated Mrs. Beach's peculiar notions and be lefs in spiritualism. After spending seven bonths abroad Mrs. Beach was summoned from Paris, the affidavit continues, by an announcement of her husband's sickness. She wanned here after his death until the latter part of June last and then accompanied by her grandson. Stanley Y. Beach, now 19 years old, Dr. J. B. Harris, a physician, and a Mrs. Woodhouse, a Spiritualist, who went with her in the capacity of lady's companion, went abroad again. Shortly afterward Rogers followed them to Europe. He was at that time married, and under indictment for an assault on a detective who had exposed his scances in 1895. Rogers's purpose, Mr. Beach asserts, was to join Mrs. Beach and defraud her of her property through the aid of Spiritualism and questionable practices connected with it. Mr. Beach continues: "Since they have been in Europe my sister lets in spiritualism. After spending seven

Mr. Heach continues:

"Since they have been in Europe my sister and I have been in constant communication with my mother, and I am able to say that Rogers has been substantially all the time in her company and travelling largely at her expense. On Jan. 6 Rogers was divorced from his wite, and afterward, to increase his influence over my mother, he procured a marriage to her at the American Presbyterian Mission at Alexandria, Egypt. She has been receiving since Jan. 1, 1896, all the income of her share of the estate at the rate of $900 per month, and has not only expended all, but has been importuning myself and my sister to pay her large sums from the principal or by way of advances on future income." I have learned that she executed a sort of trust deed of all her property to Rogers, giving him absolute control and authority over it without any consideration whatever, and that she has been in danger of being defrauded of her property ever since he followed her to Europe.

LIVE TOPICS ABOUT TOWN.

A lawyer who was for several years a well known newspaper writer in New York more than fifteen years ago still preserves a souvenir of an assignment that he covered. It is probably the largest beer glass in this city. It holds just a gallon and the initials of its owner are etched in the glass. . He was assigned on one occasion to write an article for a certain newspaper about three-cent beer. In search of information he went to Blank's brewery and interviewed Mr. Blank. It was a warm day and Mr. Blank suggested that they should have a glass of beer. When the article was printed the fact was stated that Mr. Blank had invited the writer to have "a glass of beer." One glass of beer in a brewery is too insignificant to notice, and Mr. Blank's friends made merry with him because his hospitality was limited apparently to one glass of beer. Nearly a week later the writer of the article received an invitation to call on Mr. Blank at the brewery on the following afternoon. When he arrived he found half a dozen other brewers present, and Mr. Blank at once asked him to have a glass of beer. He accepted. An employee placed before him the giant glass filled with a gailon of beer, and the other men looked across the tops of their ordinary glasses to notice the effect. If the guest was surprised he didn't show it. Bowing to Mr. Blank, he suggested "his health," and then with both hands raised the glass and drank its contents. Every brewer in the room was too much surprised to drink. Mr. Blank was disappointed. As the guest regretfully put his empty glass on the table his bots taid: 'a glass of beer." One glass of beer in a brewery

"Well was that a good glass of beer?"
"The first real good one that I have had since left Heidelberg," said the guest, "and, do you thow, they make good beer over there. Why, I remember," &c.

The grind was on the brewers, and they acknowledged it by having the glass properly atched and presenting it to the Heidelberg man.

Late on Wednesday afternoon, when the Boule rard was filled with bicycle riders, a team of big gray horses hitched to a heavy platform truck which had been standing at the corner of 100th street with no driver in sight decided, for no apparent reason, to run away. They started slowly down the Boulevard, and when they discovered that no one was bolding the reins they quickened their pace until they were running at full speed. When they started some one shouted a warning to the bicycle riders. Several women who were right in front of the horses succeeded in turning up a side street be-fore they were overtaken, and the riders who were several blocks ahead bent over their handle fore they were overtaken, and the riders who were several blocks ahead bent over their handle-bars and scorched for safety. As the horses went tearing down the Boulevard in an irregular course, the heavy truck behind them swayed first to one side and then to the other. The shouts of warning to the bleyele riders from people on the sidewalk excited the horses to run their fastest. Several fast riders kept along behind the runaway team until Ninety-fifth street was reached, when suddenly a man who wore a gray sweater forced his wheel ahead of the following riders, then alongside of the frightened horses, and, waiting his opportunity, grabbed the horse nearest him by the reins, and in less than half a block he had brought the horses to a standstill. In the crowd that surrounded the captured team the man who had stopped them was lost. When some one inquired for him it was found that he had ridden away, as if such feats were not important enough to interrupt his ride.

Tyler astonished persons interested in the busistage and his evident willingness to continue his efforts to be an actor with no apparent regard for the amount of money he was compelled to spend in his attempts, and it has always been regarded as a proof that he must have possessed a considerable fortune to have had anything left after the several years he spent on the stage. The Italian singers of the Metropolitan Company left New York in rather a perturbed frame of mind, and probably not the least element in producing this uncomfortable state of affairs was the consciousness that they are not likely to return. Signor Ancona, after a season in which he cut considerably less of a figure than usual, announced shortly before he sailed that this country cared only for "decayed artists," and that a comparatively youthful singer had no chance. This, of course, meant that Signor Ancona sang less frequently and at a considerably smaller salary than M. Lassalle. Signor Cremonini also left in chagrin, as the unfavorable comments on his performances had led him to believe that he was the victim of a conspiracy, when, as a matter of fact, he indicated last season a decided retrogression instead of an advance, and was not re-engaged because he gave no signs of improving. Mme. Mantelli had disappointed in just about the same fashion, and her place for next season had been filled by the engagement of Mme. Brazzi, an American who has not yet appeared in her own country. It was not positively known while they were in this country that there was to be no senson next year, so they were not in a pleasant frame of mind when they learned that their successors had been engaged for that they, at least, would not be required here again. The number of Italian singers in the New York companies grows smaller every year, and they play a less important part in the season's work every winter. They are usually unable to sing in any language but their own, and the French of these artists, when they essay it, is generally very amusing. There was one particular instance of this—the smurglers' music in the second act of "Carmen"—and that was always a linguistic feat that was rather more astonishing than agreeable.

WOMAN AND SHORT SKIRTS.

WITHOUT 'EM SHE IS IN FEITERS WITH 'EM SHE CAN SOAR.

Him R. Marqueette Lindley, Who Docan't Won Long Skirts, Decan't Finch Her Walst, Nor Wrap Herself in Bands, Talks to Sisters The Brooklyn Health Culture Club met at 71 Pierrepont street yesterday afternoon. A large number of the 150 members were absent, but the discussion was a lively one. Mrs. E. C. Lumsden, who called the meeting to order, requested Dr. O. F. McCune, Vice-President, to take the chair. The proceedings were informal, and the subject discussed was "Short Dresses for Street Wear." The first speaker was Miss E. Marguerite Lindley. She wore a jaunty tailor-made gown which escaped the ground b fully six inches, and she was prepared to speak in behalf of the short skirt from long personal experience. Among other things Miss Lindley

"Shortening the skirt for street wear appeal to every grade of society, to men as well as women. Many women still lack the courage to put on short skirts, but they feel that we are rganized for the benefit of the health of woman and that appeals to them. "The New York Rainy Day Club deals direct ly with the short skirt. The rule is not to wear more than eight. The gown I am wearing is six. You see it has a princess back, and they are all the rage in Paris, I hear. The weight comes from my shoulders. I have no bands around the waist, and I feel as free and as com fortable as a man. We bind and pinch ourselve in our clothing and then cry, 'We are free.' But we are not. Who took our freedom from us! t was not man, because if he had designed our gowns we probably wouldn't have worn them. "Man put stays on woman," interrupted nember of the Board of Directors. "Well," said Miss Lindley with a laugh, "we accepted the confinement pagerly."

"I'm tired of hearing women boast: 'I did so nuch work, and my back ached all the time." Let them cut off their skirts, take the tight ands from their waists, not do so much work, and give their backs a chance to get well. The inartistic effect of woman reaching around to grab up her trailing skirts ought to be enough to Mrs. Peckham, the next speaker, has pretty rown eyes, and they snapped mischievously as brown eyes, and they snapped mischievously as she said:

"When we look back to our nursery days we all remember being told over and over again about the old woman who went to the market, "her eggs for to sell." A man cut off ber petticoats, and furthermore he cut them off to her knees. I think when most people hear of women talking about adopting short skirts they expect to see a reproduction of the little old woman.
"May I add a line of ancient history I" asked Miss Lindley.

"May I add a line of ancient history!" asked Miss Lindley.
"It is said there was a time when men wore skirts and the women, who had to do all the manual labor, dressed more rationally. As man became more civilized he laid aside skirts and turned them over to the women."

"Is it the rule of this club to wear skirts three inches from the ground?" asked a visitor.
"Yes" came in chorus.
"And I can speak from experience, added Mrs. Washburn. "I shall not go back to long skirts."

skirts."
"Women are ready to adopt anything that is the style," said Dr. McCune. "I can't imagine why any woman wants to wear a dress that touches the ground. It jars her back violently, hurts her head, and tells on her nerves. If you ust wear long skirts, wear short underskirts and as few as possible."
"That wouldn't do for their summer dresses."

"That wouldn't do for their summer dresses," interrupted the secretary,
"Adapt your dress to circumstances," said Dr. McCune. "When women wore those skin-tight skirts many of them went without any underskirt, and they had a good time, too, for they were not fettered. Underskirts, to my notion, are an abomination. Every inch on the bottom of a skirt counts in weight and fatigue."
"We would make our skirts narrower if we of a skirt counts in weight and fatigue.

"We must make our skirts narrower if we make them shorter," said Mrs. Peckham. "We can't make 'em short when we have 'em six yards 'round. One thing that appeals to me in a short skirt concerns the binding. Last winter I rebound my walking skirt six times. This winter I haven't had to perform that unpleasant task once."

"Of course when you don't use your skirt for a street sweeper it doesn't wear out." ejaculated Dr. McCune.

By this time Miss Lindbar word.

a street sweeper it doesn't wear out," ojaculated Dr. McCune.

By this time Miss Lindley rose again, "Nothing helps out in comfort like the absence of bands around the waist," she said. "If women count up the folds they carry about their waists they will find no less than forty pieces. Of all things, avoid this multiplicity of unnecessary bands. They are a hamper on our nerve and blood currents, and interfere with our circulation. Let us make fasshion comfortable."

"Yes," said Dr. McCune, "and how can we digest our food when our stomachs are so pinched and pressed with bands. I wonder that any woman lives and is able to walk around. We wouldn't if we weren't so tough. From the waist to the knees women wear four times as much as is necessary, and they go almost naked from the knees down. Is it any wonder that we have congestions, tumors, and all sorts of things!"

A talented and distinguished foreign artist is abroad somewhere in New York, and his owner would like very much to discover where he is. The missing stranger is Max, the clown dog with Leonidas's trained dogs and cats that are now at Koster & Bial's. Max was the most intelligent of his master's troupe, and his continued disappearance seems to indicate that he is not able to find his way back to his master. He was lost once in Berlin, but he chewed the rone that bound him and found his way back to his master's lodgings. Leonidas believes that he is parted from the accomplished Max through foul parted from the accomplished Max through foul play.

"Max walked out with my valet on Saturday night a week ago," Mr. Leonidas said yesterday, "and somewhere near the corner of Twentieth street and Broadway he disappeared. He was not held by a leash, and it was never necessary, as he responded immediately to a whistle, however far he might have run. But he did not come back that night, and I know that he would have found the house if he had not been restrained. There is no other dog like him in New York, and he could not be mistaken for any other. He comes from Holland, has long, grayish-brown hair over all his body except his face. He is of no value to anybody but me, as I alone can make him do his tricks, which he goes through with a cat. He is three years old, a foot and a half high, and would come back home now if somebody didn't have him locked up."

BRUNETIERE ON CRITICS.

n Autobiographical Lecture-Steers Clear of Wim Bello Nellson Married to Arthur Trys PRESENTS HIMSELF AS AN OBJECT LESSON FOR STUDY.

> Invidious Comparisons with Others-Not s Word About Surcey or the Other Bramatic Critics-Repeats His Confession of Fatth Another large audience listened to M. Brunetière's fourth lecture at the Lenox Lyceum yes terday afternoon. The subject of the lecture "Modern French Criticism." Instead of taking up in succession literary, dramatic and art criticism, or of speaking of the chief critical works of Paul Bourget, Jules Lemattre, Anatole France, or the Vicomite Melchoir de Vogue, as he explained that he was tempted to do. M. Brunetière shrewdly preferred to limit himself to the general ideas on criticism, without mentioning names, but enlivening the lecture by talking about himself. If politicians and artists find no difficulty in telling of what they have done, he saw no reason why a critic should not do the same. He was the more ready to talk of himself, as his chief effort had always been to get out of himself and to get upon a solid, objective basis

This method enabled the lecturer to avoid mentioning the name of any dramatic critic, notably that of Francisque Sarcey, or to touch on his fellow literary critics except in so far as they have come into collision with himself. In explaining his own development as a critic he was enabled to lay down the chief rules of criticism in which he believes. Sainte-Beuve and Taine are the authors who inspired him most. Of the former's work he said that it was the most thorough examination of the field of French literature ever made. Taine's conviction of the close relation between the moral sciences and the natural sciences M. Rrunctière at first shared, but afterward cause to doubt. From reading Darwin's books in 1875 he endeavored to introduce the principle of evolution into criticism. The theory explained the connection with each other of the classes of literature, poetry, drama, novel, &c., and the changes from one form into another. It also preserved intact the idea of the rights of the individual to his own personality, which the methods of Sainte-Beuve and Taine seemed to attack. He tried to show that the creation of new species was analogous in literature and nature, genius in art developing qualities which are taken up by imitators and gradually enter the common stock of human attainments. Examples of this are Michael Angelo, Beethoven, Shakespeare, and Victor Hugo.

After defending his standpoint from the objections made by MM. France, Lemaitre, and d'Haussonville, the lecturer repeated his conviction that art, when compared with nature, must be considered as being merely the creation of man, a thing that does not exist in itself, and, therefore, cannot exist for its own sake. Art, whether literature, painting, sculpture, or music, would disappear were markind to become extinct on the earth. A work of art is classel more highly the more complex its nature is. It must express permanent feelings, and besides represent the life of the time and contain some moral sentiment and leason. To have exthetic mas an auxil This method enabled the lecturer to avoid mentioning the name of any dramatic critic, he had to writicise.

Brunctiere thinks that criticism has a useful function nowadays in keeping artists in the right path in spite of fashion and advertisement, especially as the ability to judge is becoming rapidly the part of the few. He thinks a new literary revolution would do no harm.

To-day M. Brunctière will deliver the last lecture of the course, his subject being the "French Novel." He sails for France to-morrow.

PUNCHED HIS DEFRAUDER. Diamend Merchant Sugarman Arrested for Assaulting a Confessed Thief. Benjamin S. Sugarman, a diamond merchant at 47 John street, who lives at 1728 Madison avenue, was arrested yesterday by Detective Sergeant Farley of the District Attorney's office for assaulting Julius Stein, who pleaded guilty ecently to the larceny of diamonds valued at $250,000 from his uncle, Julius Lyon, a Maiden lane diamond merchant, for whom he worked. Before pleading guilty to the charge, Stein implicated Joseph Robinson of 12 Stanton street, who is now under indictment on a charge of re-who is now under indictment on a charge of re-ceiving stolen goods.

Assistant District Attorney Zaring is pro-paring the case against Robinson, and he wanted a statement from a witness who does business in John street. Stein agreed to take Detective Sergeant Farley to this witness. Just after turning into John street from Nassau, Farley and Stein met Sugarman, whom they passed. Just after they passed Sugarman came up and sald to Stein. "You don't pass me by in that fashion after having swindled me out of $1,800 worth of diamonds."

"Go to blazes!" remarked Stein casually.
At that Sugarman shot out with his right and landed on the point of Stein's jaw. Before Stein could counter Farley had stepped between the two men. On seeing the detective Sugarman sald to him:

Who the devil are you! If you want some of the same medicine, come on!

Farley then showed his shield and arrested Sugarman. He subsequently turned him over to Detective Berkeley, who took the prisoner to the Centre Street Folice Court, where he was held for examination.

was subjected to a close examination on the part of the executors of his brother's estate. His identity was not disputed, but an attempt was made to prove that he was unfit to control the large fortune to which he has fallen heir.

The District Judge declared that King was a very superior order of man, and that he would not entertain any motion to prevent him from obtaining and using his money as he saw fit, and issued an order putting King in possession of the property. King acknowledged that he was a heavy drinker, and that he was a tramp sleeping in the police station at Troy when he heard of the death of his brother and his accession to the property.
